

Creating a Roadmap for your Procurement Organisation

How mature is your procurement organisation? If you were to rate your organisation against procurement best practice how would it fair? What are its strengths and where are the opportunities for improvement?

The strategic challenge for organisations undertaking the above benchmarking exercise is to enhance the maturity of the procurement function without compromising the organisation's corporate objectives. For example, many organisations have attempted to drive down costs, to discover that they then have to manage a trade off between Procurement and the rest of Supply Chain.

To further explore this issue, KPMG will discuss performance measurement through the use of a maturity matrix they have developed based on their global procurement projects. In an interactive session KPMG will describe the maturity matrix and how to measure an organisation against the matrix. The breakfast will also describe how to use this model to measure performance and create a roadmap.

Presenter

Nick Reynolds

Nick is a Director with KPMG and is head of the Operations practice in Perth. He has a broad experience of procurement from energy and pharma clients in the US to retail and government in the UK and Europe. His procurement projects have focused on creating step-change improvements in performance by emphasising customer need and designing organisations, capabilities and processes to meet that need.

In his consulting projects Nick focuses on creating sustainable improvements in operational performance. His particular area of interest is how process and organisational design can impact the effectiveness of an organisation. Procurement is central to driving both cost and operational efficiency and has therefore been an important area of his work.

In addition to procurement, Nick's Perth practice covers supply chain optimisation and operational excellence for Energy, Mining and Public Sector Clients.
